That day, Mrs. Kela went to the town very early in the morning. She went to see her brother who was a driver in the Post Office. He had called her to go and collect money for buying new uniform for her three children, Hilda, Mary and Tom, the last born, Mrs. Kela was a widow.

"Today, you will have to look after the home. Make sure you sweep the house, wash all the cups, plates and saucepans, don't forget to prepare the meal in time." She instructed her two girls as she was leaving.

After their breakfast, which was porridge and some fresh cassava, the girls started thinking about those things they had to do.

"We don't have enough fire wood left. Why don't we go to the bush and collect some?" Suggested Hilda, the eldest. "Tom will wash all the dirty plates and mugs," she added. "Okay, but before we go, let's peel some potatoes and put them on fire," Mary suggested.

"We had better do that immediately. Tom will keep checking on the fire. I'm sure when we come back, the potatoes will be ready," Hilda said.

"But I know how playful Tom is. We shall see." Mary said. Then the two sisters went to the bush. As soon as they reached the other side of the cassava garden, Tom went to the neighbour's home. He went to join his playmates.

When the girls returned with bundles of firewood, they didn't find Tom at home. The plates and mugs were they had left them. They were even dirtier than they were after breakfast. Mary went straight to the kitchen.

VILLAGE WOMAN

Look at the woman.
Tired, hungry baby,
Clinging to her back
And she herself so tired
She drags her legs
The fire wood buddle on her head
But still she drags on.

Her skin once smooth and lovely
Is now muddied and dark.
Her clothes dusty and torn
Her feet dirty and cracked

When she reaches home.
Fetches water from the well
Lights fire, prepares the food
There's more work in the field.
Till the sun sets
Dear God! When will she rest?
